Unless the arrearages of pensions act shall be assailed much more effectually than it has been as yet there will not be an imperative call for its friends to make lavish expenditure of time, talk, or ink in its defense. There has been no denial nor even an attempt to deny or call in question the justice of the measure. In all that has been said against it, no speaker or writer has asserted, and no honest, sane man will assert, that in all cases where a pension is due it should not begin at date of discharge or disability on which such pension is based.

The argument mainly relied on by the epponents of this law is that the cost of carrying out its provisions is in excess of estimates. "We don't say the law is not just; we don't say the money is not due; but we didn't know how much we owed when we agreed to pay this debt, or we wouldn't have made the agreement. Finding the obligation much greater than we anticipated, we will back away from it." Such, in plain terms, is the attitude of those who propose to repeal or rescind the arrearages act.

What sort of morals would this be for a Senator, a Representative, an editor, a politician, or any private citizen to apply to his personal business? Imagine a gentleman of ample means, abundantly able to pay all his debts without seriously impairing his fortune, saying to the poorest and most deserving of his creditors: "I owe you so much more than I thought I did that I will not pay you any more." And yet that would be less perfidious in a citizen than in a government, for the one can be seed and his property can be taken to pay his debts, while the other is a sovereign, held only by the obligation

THERE is no room for a doubt that the country is more prosperous to-day and far better off in all respects—except as relates to the public debt—than it would have been if the arrearages act had not been passed. No man has paid a dime more of taxes than he would have paid had no sneh law been spaced. The only a large depth of the relation relates to the public debt—than it would had no such law been enacted. The only difference is that some millions have gone toward canceling an obligation to soldiers and the widows and orphans of soldiers-have gone into all the channels of trade, blessing not only the immediate beneficiaries, but the entire people and country-that would else have been paid out to the holders of our bonds. Not the least among the causes of our general prosperity must this outflow of currency be accounted. And let it not be for gotten that the debt on which it has been applied was as sacred as any that a nation ever owed.

THE LIVE LION AND THE KICKING JACKALS. THE LIVE LION AND THE KICKING JACKALS.

James A. Garfield, of Ohio, had ten shares; he never paid a dollar; received $829, which after the investigation began he was anxious to have considered as a loan from Oakes Ames to himself. These men betrayed the trust of the people, deceived their constituents, and by their existing and falsehoods confessed the transactions to be disgraceful.—New York Tribuse, Fibriary 19, 1873.

The most contemptible thing thus far at Chicago is the chatter about Garfield. He has not a record to run on for President—Caccimali Commercial, June 7, 1880.

The Too Utter Mr. Wilde. Mr. Occar Wilde is said to be about twenty-five old, and is fond of violating the conventionalities of dress and demeanor. He wears in the morning a brown cut-away coat and dove-colored "tronsers," a shirt-bosom open far down the neck, topped with a yawning collar of the Byronic pattern and caught together with a ribbon of blue, and his sandy hair is a foot long or thereabouts and flows down upon his coat collar; he has to beard, but it may be merely delinquent; his pleasant eyes are bluegray; his nose, like his manners, is Chesterheidian; his jaw is protecting and massive. Below all is a pair of patent-teather boots, and above all a sort of brown fez, which, in contrast with his towering form and massive face, seems clearly a violation of asthetic principles. He has the curious upward inflection of speech, talks in a sort of rhythmic hexameter, and punctuates his sentences with a frequent laugh. tern and caught together with a ribbon of blue,

VACCINATING PRIMA DONNAS.

Various Ways in which Members of an Opera Troupe were Incentated.

"You must have your arm, Miss Juch; I assure on it will not hurt you in the least; a little tingling sensation and all is over." A well-known physician of this city was very usy yesterday with various members of Ho Jesty's Opera Company. The fear of smallpox was rampant in the breasts of prima donnas and tenors, bassos and chorus, and even the gallant manager and his brawny son were waiting their turn in the green room of the Academy of Music for incculation with the safety giving virus. "I caunot allow you to disfigure my arms, Mon-sleur," was Mile, Juch's exchamation, as she drew back with prettily-feigned horror from the doctor.

The doctor argued, but in vain, and finally the fair sobrano suggested that the inoculation should be made on one of the main supports of her body when it an attitude of prayer, the portion of the right lower limb known to the sindent of anatomy by the Latin name of spaces, Plainty, she would be vaccinated in one knee. To this the physician, after some demur, consented, and the operation was performed. "Now, if it swells," said the prima douns, as the medical man bowed himself out of her presence, "I will hate you for always."

Each member of the operativance, while anxious to be insured against the dread disease, had his of her theory as to how the lymph should be applied to their bodies. Several were willing to allow their arms to be punctured; the majority, however, especially those of the air sex, insisted on being presents.
